APPENDIX 4: TACKLE DOMESTIC LAW VARIATION

Referees should apply Laws based on the principle that infringements should be “clear and obvious”, if not – PLAY ON

If the ball carrier drops their height into the tackle and the tackler is attempting to execute a legal tackle, having dropped their height to tackle below the sternum, then they should not be deemed to have committed foul play.

Where two tacklers arrive almost at the same time, or simultaneously – one higher and one lower, it may be difficult for the referee to determine if the sequence is wrong. If it is not clearly and obviously wrong the referee should play on. The key picture for referees is that if there are two tacklers, they are at differing heights of at least below the sternum and below the line of the armpits.

All tacklers are required to make contact with the ball carrier within the required height restrictions.

One of the intentions of the Tackle domestic law variation is to create more separation of the heads of participants in the tackle.

The tackle height applies to tackles made from behind and where a successful tackle is completed by grabbing the jersey from above the sternum.
